His lecture was very interesting, and I definitely agree with just about everything he said. It was nice to see that connection back to what an open growth mindset is. It can also be very shocking to see someone who knows that they're dying be so positive and happy. Most of us would be depressed and trying to process what will happen to them. It's not something wrong, but his attitude is very admirable to see. Rather than dwelling on his upcoming death, he looks to see what we could do in our lives. The message I most identify with in this is always pursuing one's dreams. Without something to strive towards in life, there's nothing to push us forward. Bringing some reality in, of course not everyone will achieve their dreams, but without something to look forward to, we become stationary. I think he had great points to make about our lives and how the more positive we are, the more we feel we have to give and take in this world. I really enjoyed hearing his views and what he had to say and I agree with all of his views.
